

Accountability

Accountability is the quality or state of being accountable, especially of a person or organization, in respect of actions, omissions, or decisions made under their authority or control. It is the obligation or liability to account for and justify one's actions, decisions, or omissions to others. Accountability is a key principle of good governance and is essential for ensuring that those in positions of power are held responsible for their actions. It involves a clear line of responsibility, where individuals or organizations are answerable to a higher authority or to the public. Accountability is not just about being held responsible, but also about being able to explain and justify one's actions and decisions. It is a fundamental part of many systems of governance, including democratic systems, and is essential for building trust and confidence in those in power.

Accountability is a multi-faceted concept that encompasses various aspects of responsibility and answerability. It can be applied to individuals, organizations, and governments. In the context of individuals, accountability refers to the obligation of a person to answer for their actions and decisions. In the context of organizations, it refers to the obligation of the organization as a whole to answer for its actions and decisions. In the context of governments, it refers to the obligation of the government to answer for its actions and decisions to the public. Accountability is a key principle of good governance and is essential for ensuring that those in positions of power are held responsible for their actions.
